THE DOG WHO COULDN'T BARK

YOU ever meet a real birddog? A REAL ONE—I mean, not one of those pesky hounds that traipse around after hunters and think they're big-shots just because they can carry a dead bird in their mouths without leaving teeth marks...

Now Bozo, he's a REAL birddog! Not that you could tell just by looking at him. When it comes to looks, he's no different from any other overgrown, gawky, lop-eared, spotted Dalmatian...

But when he opens his mouth—THAT's when you can tell! You see—Bozo doesn't know how to bark. All he can do is chirp. And you'd never want to see a more comical sight in your life than that big dog giving chase to a mangy cat, and instead of barking, chirping, "Tweet-tweet!"

How'd he come to be that way?

Well, we men in Fire House No. 206 have our theories...

Most likely one is that when Bozo was a day-old pup, he wandered out of the cellar where he was born, out into the nearby woods, and he kept staggering till at last he met up with a family of birds that brought him up like their very own.

Well, that's what we figured happened to Bozo. The poor pup thought the mammy and pappy birds were his very own. When they taught their fledglings to chirp, he was right there along with the rest. Wasn't long before he was tweet-tweeting louder than anybody else. And if I know anything about parents, I'll bet those birds were proud as could be of their adopted son.

"He sure is queer-looking," they must've thought—"but wowie—what a chirper!"

Not that Bozo went the whole way. Never could bring himself to eat worms. We've tried to feed him some here in the fire-house, but he just looks at us with those sad shining eyes, and gives a polite but slightly disgusted chirp that means: no, thanks.

To get back to the birds that brought him up... Well, I guess the weather began turning cold after a while, and those birds got a hankering for the long flight southward. I bet they worried some about Bozo—because he was an absolute flop at flying, but they had to be sensible about it. It was the welfare of the whole bird family pitted against the loneliness of this big furry bird-dog.

So what could they do except chirp a fond farewell, promise to look him up soon as they got back—and then swoop up into the 'air...

After that, Bozo must've sadly walked out of the forest. Out onto the dusty road he must've walked, following it sadly till he reached our town.

Got to tell you a bit about our town now so you'll understand what happens later. Name of the town's Markplace, population: 2,349, number of fire houses: one.

You see—we just call our house No. 206 because all the firehouses in the big cities have high numbers like that. And we're not even real firemen—just volunteers. And our engine's so old, when it goes wheezing down the street, it looks like somebody's robbed a museum.

But we've got pride, our fire company has. And we've been fighting in the town council for years for money for a new fire engine, and we've been dreaming the same number of years about having a Dalmatian dog living in the fire house—just like they have in the big cities.

So when Bozo slunk into town without a collar on him, and Art Myer, our chief, spotted him—it wasn't much later that Bozo was bedded down right under our engine.

Let me tell you—we felt mighty fine those first few days. A real dalmatian dog...! Folks'd just have to take us more serious now, we thought—they'd have to come through with the money for the new engine!

We were so excited all that time, we didn't notice that Bozo never barked...

But then there was this fire in Farmer Couch's barn over on Sawtooth Junction. Soon as we got the alarm, we cranked up the old engine, hoisted Bozo up on the ladder, and wheezed off. By the time we got there, of course, the new engines from two towns at least ten miles farther away, had been at the scene a half-hour already, and doused the fire with their hoses. So there wasn't anything left for us to do but show off our brand new Dalmatian.

The other companies had owned their dogs for years. Those other dogs saw Bozo, they started barking hello.

And Bozo answered by chirping, "Tweet-Tweet..."

Everybody laughed but us. We wheezed away without saying a word. Now there wasn't only an old engine to be ashamed of—but also a Dalmatian that chirped...

But we didn't turn Bozo out. He looked too sad, too lonesome, and it wasn't his fault, we decided that he'd had the wrong voice-training.

He stayed with us all winter. And when Spring came, we were so used to him, we gave him no mind. Anyway, there was something else that had us real excited...

Old Ebenezer Driscoll, the only billionaire who'd ever been born in Markplace, was coming to visit the town. And the rumor was that during the day's visit, he'd make up his mind which of the town's services to give a $5,000 present to. That meant if we made a good impression on old Ebenezer, we might wind up with a new engine after all...

It was a clear warm day when Ebenezer Driscoll stood on the wooden platform set up on Main Street just for this shindig. And he looked mighty fine up there with that old-fashioned high beaver hat on his head. Art Myer, our chief was up on the platform with him—but so were Joe Bulik who was out to get that $5,000 for the Park Department, and Mort Green who was after the same for the Sanitation Department...

It was time for Old Ebenezer to make his speech. He got up, and his wrinkled face cracked in a toothless smile. He cleared his throat...and just then a swarm of birds dove down out of the sky and began pecking at him!

No one knew why at the time—but we've figured it out since...All last summer there'd been a scarecrow wearing a high beaver hat out at Farmer Couch's farm. There'd been an electric siren inside the scarecrow. And every once in a while, that siren would go off and scare the daylights out of all birds within six miles. Always gave them a terrible fright, that scarecrow did...and they must've brooded about it down south all winter. Today, returning, the first thing they spotted was old Ebenezer standing there with a beaver hat on his head just like the scarecrow's. So figuring they'd show who was boss right at the start of the new season, they'd attacked...

Migosh, the yelling and squawling and fainting that was going on while those birds were pecking Old Ebenezer. He was hopping with pain and anger, and there wasn't a department chief on that platform who didn't think the $5,000 was gone forever.

But then Bozo ran up on that platform and gave a few sharp chirps like he was saying: "That's no scarecrow, you durned fools—lay off!" The birds chirped back sheepishly, sort of brushed old Ebenezer off with their wings, and took off into the air again...

Well, when Old Ebenezer found out which department Bozo belonged to, there was no question any more where that $5,000 would go!

Yes sree—that's the new engine back there. Pretty, ain't she?

Where's Bozo...? Just wait around. He'll be back in about an hour. We passed the hat, and every Wednesday afternoon he goes to Miss Abigail Wentworth. She's the voice instructor in the next town.

She's teaching Bozo how to bark.
